performed, I wandered out from the camp. The moon rose, casting its melancholy-wrapping light upon our sleeping men; and, it ed with exection and excitement, I wrapped the folds of my boat cloak closer around me, casting myself upon a grassy bank, while my mind rounted far and side, among distant friends and scenes that were daguerrectyped upon my heart's tablet. Lock-ing up at the puls orb, which sailed in queenly majesty through the blue, cloud i landed occan of other. I thought of Moore's beautiful idea:

r. I thought of Monie's ocautiful in Sweet moon if like Crotone's area

By any spell my hand could dare

To make thy these its sample mare,

In on the third throughts, noy wishes there;

I the wanders o'er the starry sky,

should mile upon the orb, to meet.

The recollection kind and sweet;

The promise never to forget;

The promise of food report;

The promise never to forget;

And all my heart and soul would send.

To many a dear loved, distant fromd."

My senses, drowned in the dreamy reverie pro duced by the stronge yet beautiful wish of the poet, gradually gave way to the advances of

"Tir'd Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," from which the sweet carrolling of birds and the bughe's call aroused me, to look upon the first rosy blush of the young day, as it simidly stole from its night shadowed couch, kissing the party dew drops from the monopolising flowers, and applying the last finishing color-touch of perfecto Dame Nature's toilet.

Hastily we made our dejeune, which delicate repast consisted of raw pork and ship's bisemit, and manning our boats, prepared to leave this sadly beautiful island.

Ere I took my seat in the hoat, I pulled up a young magnelia, and planted it upon the grave of the young Indian maiden, whom, I had for-gotten to state, we had buried separately from he sterner and harsher sex, - feeling that the pure and delicate lily would not be a fitting companion for the decaying oak; that there was something too pure in her to be contaminated by the touch even in death, of the blood-stained

Some other hand had rudely carved on the bark of the overhanging cypress, a cross, the symbol of a religion probably unknown to her who had so lately been summoned to witcess the dread reality of all it teaches. But however ignorant of our religious forms that poor girl might have been, I doubt not that she had a religion, a pure and moral one too; for I have yet hgion, a pure and meral one too; for I have yet to meet an Indian who does not believe in the power and goodness of a "Great Spirit," who were blameable for the war, or the sufferings of will reward the good and punish the wicked; I was not they who were blameable for the war, or the abused savage; it was the black-hearted, not the abused savage; it was the black-hearted, not the abused savage; it was the black-hearted, not the abused savage; it was not they who have yet to see the savage who believes not in souled policy of the men who raised the war by some moral teaching faith; and for many years I have occasionally met with the unschooled sufferings; the men who stole their property, aborigines, in their own territories and in those far southern climes, where, from the time of Cortez and Pizarro up, they have been slaves and bondsmen, held beneath a rod and yoke of that part of the main land, to which the Indians had on the preceding day retreated. Our boats moved as lightly over the rippling waters as if their crews had not been diminished, and the care'ess smile, the merry eye, and lively chat, told how soon the chill thrown by death around men who are used to his presence, can be melted -how light its effect on such as have felt and refelt his shadowy glosm. It is like a transient shade thrown upon the surface of the blue ocean by a passing cloud, felt or seen but for a ent, while the shadow intervenes, then trace-never before to our knowledge borne a white man's keel, unless in the early days of enterprise, when Spain's noblest cavaliers, emulous of Methusalch's recl of time, sought "Through tangled brake and forest glen," the flowery islands, which, like brilliant gems of many hues in an ezure setting, were scattered around us; the lively paroquet, the flamingo, with its coat of crimson down, and the pink curlew would rise in whiching circles above our heads, screaming fortis their alarm, appearing to know that we were strangers and intruders there. In the distance, the grey-brown buzzard havered the fountain of perpetual youth-passing among that we were strangers and intruders there. In the distance, the grey brown buzzard hevered ever the pine-barren, seeming with his ever hungry sye to be watching for the victims of the battle.

The part of the main the distance above the surrounding entific men to covitate upon, especially as the highest fand within some hundred miles of the spot, is only 178 feet above sea level.

This is not the fountain of youth, however—for though we have tracked.

heavy live oaks, and here and there a few moss-hung, spectral looking cypress trees. From our hung, spectral looking cypress trees. From our reckoning, we supposed eurselves near the spot, celebrated fount may lie among the sulphur where Colonel, (now Brigadier General) Taylor, springs in which the rivers St. John's and Suhad engaged an immense body of the enemy, on Christmas eve, 1836, whom after a severe and bloody fight, he drove from their position, with MARI the loss of near 150 men on his side, while, so far as known, the loss on the side of the ene was compare ively trifling. In this action, the hardest fought during the war, the gallant 6th Regiment of U. S. Infantry suffered greatly, one company being almost entirely annihilated, its officers all slain, with one exception, and hardly a man escaped uncrippled. Here in the foremost rank fell the gallant Col. Thompson, Lieut. Van Swearingen, and a host of others whom at pres-Swearingen, and a host of others whom at pres-tree we have neither space nor time to enumerate. The Indians, for weeks prepared for the contest, had by many a cunning wile and stratagem, drawn Col. Taylor to the spot, and after delivering a few fatal fires, when the bayonet opened the branches of their covert, fied to the lake, where the Colonel having no beats, could not pursue them. Had the cool, calm, deliberate bravery here exhibited, been displayed upon a civilized field, the gallant 6th would have been civilized field, the gallant 6th would have been lauded to the skies, but it is thought by many that fittle glory can be gained in an Indian war. Is it because the wilderness hides the face of the menacing foe? Is it because one cannot see the had which flings death through the ranks, that less bravery need be displayed in the combat with the savage, he who has no ear for mercy, and thinks it a crime to give even the htblicks with the savage, he who has no ear for mercy, and thinks it a crime to give even the htlpicss woman quarter? False! unjust and mean are such ideas! Men can gaze upon an advancing column, when it moves upon the same ground as that which they occupy, formed of men moulded and framed as they, with much more coolness than they can stand hip-deep in a muddy swamp where every tree and shrubby bush conceals a deadly foe; where the whiz of a rifle ball is their deadly foe; where the wint of a fine bants that only warning, their music, unearthly yells, which are cohoed on every side by the groans of those who are falling unavenged around, by hands invisible. In such a place, at such a time, I have stood, and the tremor of every leaflet would sand a chill cold as death to my heart; every whoop seemed the laugh of a demonwaiting to crag me to my grave, and gladly would I then have changed my stuation to an open plain with thrice the number of my fees d me, where I could most them unacc around me, where I could meet them unaccom-panied by he horrors which their mode of warfare cauces the imagination to paint.

True, also for many of the brave and already forgotten fallen; too true is the far echoed idea that there is no honor, no credit to be gained in such a war. There in the distant forest they have fellen unwept, oftentimes unknown; there they have found unshrouded a soldier's shall we grays, no monument but the hoary trees above grave, no monument but the hoary trees above them, no friend to tell their virtues, their history or death, or to mourn their loss—there forgotten they lie in the damp morass, their mimory already covered with the mould of oblivion.

We neared the shore cautiously, expecting and fearing a reception similar to that which I have before described, but not a sound or motion indicated the existence of a human being. A small herd of red doer standing on the bank, quietly gazing at us, satisfied us that there was no danger to be apprehended, and at once we landed. On gaining the shore, we found that we were indeed on the "battle ground,"—the broken and ready covered with the mould of oblivion.

We neared the shore canbiously, expecting and fearing a reception similar to that which I have before described, but not a sound or motion indicated the existence of a human baing. A small herd of red doer standing on the bank, quietly gazing at us, satisfied us tant there was no dan ger to be apprahended, and at once we landed. On gaining the shore, we found that we were indeed on the "battle ground,"—the broken and dead branches of trees shattered by balls, scraps of clothing and stumps of small saphings which had been ent down for litters, all betokened the place. A short distance from the thicket, a few large mounds, on which the young grass had just begin to form a sod, and wild violets to bloom, showed warer laid all thet was earthly of the gallant fallen.

The Indians had apparently been awaiting an attack is, this place for days, judging from the ashes of their numerous camp fires. They had even cut notches in the large live oak trees which skirted the open ground, in which to ensure a latal aim they had rested their rifles. Dreadfully fatal was that first fire which lit up the gloom of the dark hammook, like lightning in a night storm, making the succeeding darkness doubly

Now however, all was quiet and peaceful. The leer and its light limbed fawo grazed and gambo'ed upon the late scene of battle, the wild flowers threw their fragrant breath upon the air, and the clear waters of the sparkling streamlet poured forth brightly into the lake, as if they had never been tinged with the ruddy life-tide which had been shed upon their pebbly banks. The sweet singing of birds echeed through the ferest, where te hell's own music had rung its wildest notes, reczing the half-curdled veins of the dying, and stariling the bravest of them all. Seeing nothing of the enemy, we re-embarked in our boats and returned to the island, where we set to work, according to "orders from head quarters," at destroying the half-ripened c ops of the natives and burning their paintha ched ints. While the work of destruction was progressing-while their corn and fruits were fa ling beneath our all devouring hands, and we were tearing down their lovely arbors, treading in paths where the young and tender infant reminded me of the joyous summer hours of bare-footed childhood, I thought that there was almost an excuse for their savage excess of revenge. While I thought of their homes made desolate, the r crops destroyed; their fathers, sons, husbands and even tender women and children with reflection at my side, I could scarce wonder that their every wish should be,

"Vengeance! dire vengeance or wretches who had cast O'er them and all they loved, that ruinous blast." I felt that they were fighting for rights derived from a common Father, and when I thought of their oppression, I wondered that a just, merciful, black injustice; suffering its originators, or even its perpetrators to go free upon the earth, enjoying blessings which they have snatched from the hands of the poor Aborigines, glorying in the possession of blood-bought, honor-damning, infamy-stained property. But all in His good time, we are born to obey, and should not cavil at the mysteries which lie beyond the incomprehensible grasp of our feeble minds.

In saying these things, I would not have a reader think that I mean to reflect aught sgainst the characters of my brave comrades in arms, who served through that perilous, ill-starred and ill-paid war. No, in doing them that injustice, sufferings; the men who stole their property, burned their homes, destroyed their crops, and when the injured came to them for redress, gave it at the whipping post, in irons on the stocks.

These are no false or unfounded charges. My heart burns with indignation as I call to mind the innumerable outrages, some of which this paper would blacken to hold, that I know were perpetrated upon the Indians, and which gave rise to the war. We were ordered there by our superiors, and our duty was to obey their orders.

I will not attempt at present either to justify or condemn the management of a war which cost our country nearly fifty millions of dollars, and three thousand valuable lives; but shall in my future numbers attempt only to eke out my yarns, with facts and truth deduced from personal observation made during four years of hard service in that land of birds and alligators, mud and flowers, deer and catamounts, wherein, according to the chronicles of Ponce de Leon, Hernandes de Soto and others, bubbles up in secrecy the revivifying "fountain of eternal
